Donna Brazile became the first African American woman to lead a major party presidential campaign in 2000 when she managed the campaign of former Vice President Al Gore, and has worked on every major presidential campaign since 1976. Brazile is the former interim Chair of the Democratic National Committee (DNC) and the founder of Brazile and Associates LLC, a consulting, grassroots advocacy, and training firm.

Yolanda Caraway was the Chief of Staff on Jesse Jackson's historic second presidential campaign and is a DNC member-at-large. Since 2008, she has managed backstage and podium operations for the Democratic National Convention. Throughout her 30-year career through the Caraway Group (founded 1987), she has counseled Fortune 500 companies, non-profit organizations, government agencies, and high profile industries.

Leah D. Daughtry is the first and only person in history to serve twice as the Democratic National Convention Committee CEO (2008 & 2016). She is currently President and CEO of the boutique strategic planning firm On These Things LLC, Daughtry has worked on Capitol Hill, for the DNC, and for Labor Secretary Alexis Herman. She is an ordained minister and pastor of The House of the Lord Church in Washington, DC,

Minyon Moore served as Assistant to the President and Director of White House Political Affairs and Director of White House Public Liason for President Clinton, and served as CEO and National Political Director of the Democratic National Committee. She held high-level roles in the presidential campaigns of Jesse Jackson, Michael Dukakis, and Hillary Clinton. She is a partner at the Dewey Square Group,
